Teachers of all grades and disciplines often dip into their own wallets to outfit their classrooms with materials and supplies that school and district budgets cannot, or will not, cover. Science teachers tend to find themselves supplementing their shrinking funds with even greater frequency. This collection of essays, carefully selected by former NSTA President and current Science and Children editor Linda Froschauer, outlines creative and inexpensive ways for preK through fifth-grade science teachers to keep their expenses to a minimum in five categories: Student-Created Constructions, Teacher-Created Constructions and Repurposed Materials, Teaching Strategies That Maximize the Budget, Instructional Lessons That Maximize the Budget, and Funds and Materials. Chapters provide inexpensive alternatives to costly classroom projects, offer re-imagined uses for items teachers already have at home or school, and suggest new and untapped resources for materials. Even more important than offering ideas for frugality, the activities and strategies better enable teachers to develop the conceptual understanding of their students. A comprehensive list of the many free resources available from the National Science Teachers Association is also included.
